On the ISES proceedings website you can search and find papers published under the proceedings of ISES conferences. Each paper is published with a unique Digital Object Identifier (DOI). This database offers the global renewable energy community with easy and searchable access to ISES conference proceedings.

energy consumption are reported directly by the model. For the industrial sector – the largest energy-consuming sector in China – and the freight transport subsector, we conducted additional analyses to differentiate the urban share of total activity and energy consumption from the rural share.

Establishing understanding of trends and fundamental mechanisms for energy transport is important for identifying those that are most likely to be useful. We report calculations of electronic structures in relation to energy transport and optical properties in halide scintillators.
